R M Bogan Archaeological Repository offers staff, anthropologists state-of-the-art curation and storage

An exhilarated professor points to rows and rows of boxes, eagerly pulling out worn spearheads, withered rocks and tattered fragments. He cannot wait to share the history, the findings of each piece. These artifacts, dating back thousands of years, each tell a story, and Jared Wood, Ph.D., RPA, is thrilled to be the anthropologist to help narrate them.

Invasion of the Trees: Professor's comic connects entertainment to plant sciences

Imagine a character so powerful, so toxic, that it could take over the world—well, the world's forests at least. John T. Van Stan, Ph.D., assistant professor of geography, is bringing this character, and many others like it, to life, while educating the public on the impact invasive and native tree species have on water.

Nontraditional student rewrites his future

Although he's managed to own businesses, work for the government, coach soccer, raise four kids and publish several successful novels — all with only a high school diploma — Ashley "Blue" Cole says his story is far from ending.

Cole, a 40-year-old nontraditional student, is determined to rewrite his own story by staying focused, maintaining balance in his life, and earning his bachelor's in general studies online from Georgia Southern University.

"I think this degree will challenge me to look at things from a younger perspective," he said.
