The 2017 School of Human Ecology Undergraduate Research Symposium was held on April 18, 2017. During the symposium undergraduate students in the School of Human Ecology were given the opportunity to present their research. Students were mentored by Trent Maurer, Ph.D., professor of child and family development, Jennifer Zorotovich, Ph.D., assistant professor of child and family development, and Nikki DiGregorio, Ph.D., assistant professor of child and family development. The following research was presented:

- Nikkolette Owens: “Cultural assimilation: African American women’s membership to multiple subcultures”
- Rachel Parker: “Personal Responsibility Education Program: Let’s talk about sex”
- Latrice Burgess: “Communicating with children about parental incarceration”
- Amanda Catron: “Sex isn’t just for young adults”
- Cassidy Keim: “Replication and Extension of Classroom Activity Using the Bogardus Social Distance Scale”
