3. Special thanks are extended to 1977 officers:

DANIEL TANIER...who designed and chaired the fine symposium: Session 22.07 entitled "What the Curriculum Field Needs to Learn from its History." Together, but from differing perspectives, the presenters were asked to address the question: "Why has the curriculum field at various times during the 20th century been marked by vital and creative changes, whereas at other times it has been characterized as suffering from relative inertia, retrenchment, and reaction? Leonard Cerk (DISE) argued, drawing upon several historical sources in the field, that we should study curriculum history as an aid to curriculum problem finding, thus becoming more responsive to children and youth. Art Hirth (Washington University) argued that curricular applications which promote either overly romantic freedom or the image

Leonard Berk (OISE) argued, drawing upon several historical sources in the field, that we should study curriculum history as an aid to curriculum problem finding, thus becoming more responsive to children and youth. Art Wirth (Washington University) argued that curricular applications which promote either overly romantic freedom or the image of business efficiency function as impediments to a Deweyan style of curriculum development, because they negate the teacher's role as one who continuously seeks meaning through inquiry into what the teacher and his/her work can and should become. Ralph Tyler (SVA) drew upon his long and distinguished career in curriculum and evaluation, from prior to the Eight Year Study and beyond National Assessment; he concludes by posing a number of provocative questions for those who are concerned with curriculum history. Philip Jackson [University of Chicago] emphasized several signs of educational progress, including the spread of schooling in the Western world, the gradual reduction of consciously created human discomfort, and the relative rise of critical rationality as compared with "sing-song" recitation methods. An interesting brief interchange of ideas among the presenters and audience members followed the presentations.

4. The matter of uses for the small amount of accumulated assets in the SIG bank account was discussed. Suggestions included: (a) a monograph of previous and/or future SIG papers; (b) a social hour for SIG members at the 1979 AERA Conference in San Francisco; (c) support for a research venture that involves the general interest of SIG members. No decision was reached with regard to these suggestions.

However, it was agreed that funds would be provided for distribution of two of the 22.07 presentation papers, those by Arthur Wirth and Ralph Tyler, to all 1979 SIG members. Many thanks to Professors Tyler and Wirth for providing their papers for this purpose.

Suggestions for other uses of the funds may be made to any member of the Coordinating Council listed above. The council will review all suggestions. Approximately $200 remains in the account.
