Coon Island: Two Poems in Dedication

after Heaney, in memory of my father

I. Rose of Sharon

There was a sunlit absence, a chill despite the sun up and the hot wind,
the hyacinths sunk

back into the grass,
and the daffodils—
the bulbs he dozed
across the yard

with a bushhog—gone too.
So, what was left was just a Rose of Sharon
no bigger than a weed,

leaning with the weight of three blooms. She stood beside it, that June,
in her church clothes.

Now she sits in the quiet house, or reads, or turns toward the chair
where he used to sit and read.

Here is his Bible,
a slip of paper
still marking some verse,

and here is love
like the woodbox stocked with small logs,
ready for what’s ahead.
II. The Angelus

All around the house there are raccoons, as if their image could deflect the history of what happened, of whose farms and homes were here before my grandpa bought the soggy bottom fields between the backed-up Cache and the dredged line of Remmel Ditch. But here above her chair: two peasants, his cap in his hands, her hands clasped, a church on the horizon. Between the couple lies a basket of potatoes, which masks the small coffin Millet painted over, the skies dark with hidden loss, the bells that toll the difference between what we see and know. Even from this distance, I hear them now.
