Georgia Southern study shows parents think their overweight preschool children are 'about the right weight'

Despite the rise of obesity in America, and despite the very public awareness campaigns that surround the problem, a new study from Georgia Southern suggests parents are getting worse at judging whether or not their children are overweight.

The study, “Change in Misperceptions of Child's Body Weight among Parents of American Preschool Children,” is the brainchild of Dr. Jian Zhang, associate professor of epidemiology in the Jiann–Ping Hsu College of Public Health, and included research from Andrew Hansen, Dr.P.H., assistant professor of community health behavior and education, and researchers from New York University Langone Medical Center and Fudan University in Shanghai.

The study has received national attention, getting picked up by media outlets such as The Washington Post, TIME magazine and the TODAY show.

Former Eagle Makes Major League Debut

Former Georgia Southern University baseball player Chris Beck made his pitching debut for the Chicago White Sox on Thursday. He pitched for the Eagles from 2010–2012 and was drafted by the White Sox in 2012. Beck has seen playing time as a member of the White Sox Triple-A affiliate, the Charlotte Knights.
