Award-winning author, information design specialist Manuel Lima presents lecture at Georgia Southern on Oct. 13

September 29, 2016

Renowned author and information design specialist Manuel Lima will visit Georgia Southern on Thursday, October 13 as part of the Betty Foy Sanders Department of Art’s Professions in Practice lecture series.

Billed “a digital designer and information guru” by New Scientist magazine and the “man who turns data into art” by WIRED magazine, Lima is an award-winning designer and author. His books Visual Complexity: Mapping Patterns of Information and the Book of Trees: Visualizing Branches of Knowledge explore the many creative ways designers, artists and historians are able to present complex information effectively—engaging audiences ranging from the everyday to the specialized. Lima is considered one of the leading voices on information visualization and has spoken at venues such as TED, Lift, OFFF, Harvard, MIT, NYU Tisch School of the Arts and many others.

"Having a world-renowned designer and researcher like Manuel Lima visit with our students and speak to the community is a great opportunity," said Gallery Director Jason Hoelscher. "Art and design each approach information, complexity and communication in quite different ways, and each has a lot to offer to our so-called information age. Manuel’s groundbreaking work on visualizing how information works—whether in terms of economies, sports statistics, weather patterns and more—will offer our art and design students provocative ways to consider their roles as non-traditional information and communication specialists."

Lima’s lecture will begin at 5 p.m. in Visual Arts Building, room 2071. The event is free and the public is invited to attend.
