ARTIST RECEPTION

Kingdom Under Glass examines the relationship between exploration and exploitation. For decades, natural history museums have presented dioramas that are meant to educate patrons and as preserve endangered animals or environments. However, these staged spectacles strike the artist as overly utopian and seductive.

The paintings in this exhibition question the role of dioramas and society's perception of these scenes. Each painting highlights the idealized manner in which the specimens are presented, while also calling into question the methods in which they were procured.
