Georgia Southern University has started work to build a world-class, state-of-the-art $5.8 million Shooting Sports Education Center on campus. The facility will public indoor archery and firing ranges and an outdoor archery range.

The mission of the facility is to educate hunters and archers to be responsible shooting sports enthusiasts and promote safe firearms and bow handling. "This is the epitome of a public, private and government partnership," said University President Brooks A. Keel, Ph.D. "It's a relationship where we have all come together to make something unique happen. The Center will allow Georgia Southern to promote shooting safety, hunter safety and shooting education."

The Shooting Sports Education Center is a partnership between Georgia Southern and the Georgia Department of Natural Resources (DNR). The DNR secured a $3.5 million grant to go along with private donations made to the University and support from the Easton Foundation and the City of Statesboro. "We want to thank Georgia Southern for grabbing on to this concept that we came up with and recognizing the value added components of what a world class shooting facility would add for the students and people in the surrounding community," said Mark Whitney, assistant director of the Wildlife Resources Division with the DNR.

"This is the beginning of an exciting adventure," said Teresa Thompson, Ph.D., vice president of Student Affairs and Enrollment Management. "Every once and a while, a project comes along that has exciting opportunities for the future. This shooting center can be a catalyst for developing students who will one day represent our nation as Olympic shooting sports champions." The Center is expected to boost the local economy by bringing thousands of visitors to campus and Statesboro each year for training, tournaments and competitions. It will also be the home of the Georgia Southern women's rifle team.

The Center will be the only facility of its kind east of the Mississippi River and will provide learning and recreational experiences for many students and introduce them to the world of shooting sports. "The comprehensiveness and versatility of this facility will allow for multiple disciplines of shooting sports to come together and serve as a hub for education, training, competition and recreation," said Gene Sherry, executive director of Campus Recreation and Intramurals (CRI).
