Several farmers have already combined bahia grass seed this year and from these reports it looks as if the seed crop will be light. Cooperators of the Ogeechee River Soil Conservation District reporting bahia seed combining are Henry Blitch and Fred Blitch in the West Side community, Troy Mallard and Thad J. Morris in Port and J. W. Brannen in Statesboro. Others will be combining in the very near future.

Case for the light seed crop can be charged to the heavy rains this year. Also some farmers failed to put enough nitrogen to make a good crop. What happened is this: the nitrogen which was applied in the spring was leached from the soil by the excess rain and not replaced in sufficient quantities.

Mr. Theron Neal in the Stilton community took his cows off his bahia in June and applied about 100 units of nitrogen in the form of ammonium nitrate. This is going to give him a heavy crop of seed and also a good yield of hay following the combine.

I have never seen such a beautiful sight of seed and green leafy grass as I saw on his farm last week. This form of nitrogen worked fine this year with excess rain, but ordinarily you would want to apply about 50 units of nitrogen all in the nitrate form. This would make for uniform ripening of the seed.

I also saw something else out at Mr. Neal's farm—cows were eating bahia hay (he cut and baled the hay right behind the combine last year) on coastal bermuda sod. Theron said the bermuda was getting tough, but the cows were really cleaning up the hay. He said they ate the

Give cows a 'vacation' says county agents

Cows that will freshen this fall should be dry now. Give them a six to eight week "vacation" and they will repay you by giving much more milk the following lactation if they have the rest and proper feed. It's just too much to expect to hope for high production this fall and winter if dry cows are on poor, dry pasture now. They won't get into condition for high production by fall. It is one mark of a good cow that she is usually thin in flesh at the end of her lactation. She should regain her normal weight during the dry period, and it pays the dairyman to see to it that feed is provided to enable her to make such a gain in weight.

DRY COWS need salt and water and it should be kept where they can get all they want when they want it. A mineral mix in a covered box kept in the pasture is another recommendation of dairy specialists that shouldn't be ignored.
