Liming is first step in Big M pasture program in Bulloch

The rains this fall in Statesboro Washington and the surrounding areas have made for an unusually wet spring for farmers in the statesboro area. The Big M Program in Bulloch County is designed to help farmers with their pasture problems. The first step in the program is liming, which involves adding calcium to the soil to improve its quality. This process helps to increase the productivity of the pasture, allowing farmers to produce more grass and other crops. The program is aimed at improving the economic well-being of farmers in the area, and it is expected to have a positive impact on the local economy. The program is being funded by a combination of government grants and private donations, and it is being administered by a team of experts in the field of agricultural science. The program is expected to continue for several years, and it is hoped that it will provide a lasting solution to the pasture problems faced by farmers in the area.
Mr. and Mrs. Pittman High are selected for the Future Farmers of America. During the past year, they have worked with adults who have helped to care for and plant various crops. They have learned about the care and maintenance of these crops, including proper fertilization and irrigation. Their efforts have resulted in a bountiful harvest, providing them with fresh vegetables and fruits throughout the year. They have also learned about the importance of sustainability and the impact of their actions on the environment. This experience has been instrumental in shaping their views on agriculture and the role of farmers in society.

The Future Farmers of America Week, February 15-21, is a time to recognize and celebrate the contributions of farmers and agricultural workers. It is a week to highlight the importance of agriculture and to encourage young people to consider pursuing careers in this field. During this week, farmers and agricultural workers are invited to share their stories and experiences with students and the community. The Future Farmers of America Week is an opportunity to celebrate the hard work and dedication of farmers and to inspire the next generation of agricultural leaders.
